

So far this autumn, Imperial has been hit with three snowstorms, all coming in October. The most recent one (and the biggest) struck last Thursday night, dropping eight and a half inches of snow, according to Cory Schuller, who records temperatures and moisture totals for the National Weather Service. As people dug out Friday morning, the Imperial area appeared more like winter. Like so many others in town, Jon Peterson was trying to get his car out of the snow and drifts along West 6th Street so he could get to a funeral that morning. Warm temperatures made it a much more pleasant weekend, and all but a few patches of snow here and there were gone on Monday. (Republican photo)
