

With temperatures peaking at 80 degrees last week, corn fields started drying out, allowing farmers to finally get into the fields and make a good dent on this year's harvest. Farmers said the moisture content of the corn, which has been keeping farmers out of the fields as well, has started to fall with the recent warm weather. Here, as the sun began to set on the western horizon Sunday, it silhouettes a combine and operator harvesting on Yaw Farms. (Republican photo)
